As long-time Camden Town residents, we join neighbours and all those who live in the area in condemning the silly ferris wheel project. A market is a market, not a funfair. London already has at least one excellent ferris wheel, called the Eye, easily accessible from Camden Town. In any case, a good ferris wheel needs an impressive view, something that's not really available from anywhere in Camden Town.

Bringing yet more people crowding into the area is one thing we don't need. Every Sunday the underground station is dangerously overcrowded and often unusable for residents and visitors wanting to leave the area by tube. If the aim is to make Camden market more attractive and improve facilities for visitors then the priority should be to use some of the inflow of cash from tourists to redevelop the underground station and give this important cultural, commercial and historically significant part of London a transport facility that is at least worthy of the 20th century; this could include a visitor centre, police station and a properly serviced public lavatory, among other amenities.
