I have worked in Bloomsbury for nearly 30 years during which time it's character has been systematically eroded by corporate commercial concerns. It has lost countless independent businesses and is becoming characterless city sprawl. It is the home of the British Museum and in visitors to that attraction alone earns it's keep. The last thing needed is another office block (there are hundreds of empty offices within walking distance) - especially as the proposal makes little or no effort to conform to the now pressing needs against climate change. Stop thinking about today's money - guard against tomorrow's rubbish.
