

Christopher J Emmett
Flat 3
20 Woodchurch road
London NW6 3PN

4-10-15

I assume your letter regarding renovations at 22D Woodchurch road London NW6 3PN, to be a prefatory legality, and my objection will be meaningless.

Nevertheless, I do object to it.

I was moved here just over five years ago, because of planning permission to build a school on where I last lived (Mill Lane NW6)--to what one might expect to be a nice quiet peaceful road. (The school was built) Won't go through a whole dirge, but within a year of moving in, the house across the road from where I live, was completely renovated, taking the best part of year and a half.

You can imagine the noise of lorries, skips, and all forms of delivery, then add the noise of the actual building/renovation.

This went on for about 15 months. I watched it coming an end, and I thought, brilliant, a little bit of peace at last.

I forgot to mention the noise of the workers shouting to each other—guttural rubbish—know what I mean.

As if on cue, a house three doors away went into a 'massive' renovation, and so all the noise continued, as above, for another 15 months.

That finished quite recently (2 to 3 months ago), and we began to have a little bit of peace.

This area seems to be the home of workmen—banging, banging, banging. In the house where I live, we recently had scaffolders putting up a small amount of scaffolding to fix the chimney.

They left it for about three weeks. When they came back to remove it, one expects the noise of the removing, but it's the noise of the scaffolders that 'can' be the real problem.

They shout at the top of their voices, and the words fuck or fucking seem to appear at the end of each word.

And not only were the two houses mentioned renovated, but the one at the corner of West End Lane and Woodchurch road, also did a big renovation job, and that also was very noisy.

2

Almost five years of continuous noise.
SO YES, I DO OBJECT.

Yours sincerely..

