I've lived 40 years in this "modernising" area and earlier years in the country when ancient farmers markets did have necessary local benefits, support and social connections. This particular current commercial London device uses the old label but its organisation is part of a sophisticated, wide spread, profiteering business with no loyalty here. Low-paid employees in the stalls are not farmers. This market brings no incomes into West Hampstead. I recognise how some locals believe they will have a personal pleasure in that road, any day they like, with their own tastes in food or flowers. But unfortunately this advantage must be balanced against the serious disadvantage and non-personal safety rights of commuters and other needs. Despite council regulations attempting to control individual market vehicles there will be long term, daily interference with the parking spaces and the movements for all other vehicles around this already heavily congested zone.
