I assume it is a crucial factor in such a development and it suggests incompetence in the original application or a try-on. It is lucky that sharp-eyed neighbours noticed the application. I can't imagine that it can be thought reasonable to locate such a thing next door to a house given that seepage is likely to occur at some time, given that there are areas of the development away from houses, and given the original lack of forethought. Many neighbours consider the whole project misconceived and the site very over-developed.
