Objection

I read on the 'myjewishlearning.com'

'Despite its symbolic nature, the eruv is intended to mimic in some way the form of walls'

So that is a full-fledged wall; lets imagine these are walls made of stone or brick, with a series of doorways (which the faith requires to be shut or have the potential to be shut at night), because this is what the posts and wires represent in an attempt to circumnavigate planning. Thus creating a private domain in part of Camden to encompass hitherto public and privately owned land.

The application should be read as building physical walls in contravention of Planning Policy and the Local Plan and rejected on this basis.
