It would be great loss to our neighbourhood to cut down this 100 year old tree when it is possible to reduce damage to the Egypt Exploration society building with use of tree surgeons and structural engineers.

The EES have no problem rallying support from their patrons in endeavour to preserve historic and important Egyptian landmarks and artefacts. This tree is a landmark to this neighbourhood and the surrounding wildlife. Is it not in their own philosophy to treat this historical tree with the same graces, and find a solution to minimise damage without irreversible demolition?

The protection of trees and green spaces in our area is imperative to London's plans to make the city greener and reduce pollution. We owe it to the next generation to protect our city's oxygen levels, animal habitats and natural beauty.

Kind regards,

Antonia
