To whom it may concern:

And it really should concern you - that greedy developers want to erect a tower of 74metres which will overshadow the views from Bedford Park, the British Museum and Drury Lane, and take away even more sky - and provide little for the local community only serving to fill the developers pockets.

Central London does not require further office space, office space is becoming redundant, society has changed, office spaces are closing, people are working from home. So no more office space please. Also to allow an increase of 20.41 metres over the height of the current Travelodge is not in keeping with the surrounding buildings.

Homes are needed. Not office space. The current Travelodge building could be glamourised and used in many different ways to support the professional creativity of Soho and Covent Garden.

The coffers of the GDP are filled by the creative industries in Covent Garden and Soho. Affordable homes are required to house the workers who support the creative industries, or homes for those who were born here and have their families here.

Don't price them out! They might even be you!

Sincerely
